Secondary Schools at the Turn of the Century

by Theodore R. Sizer

As public schools spread rapidly to fill the gap between common school and college at the end of the nineteenth century, a definition of the aims and curriculum of these secondary schools was badly needed, and a committee, "The Committee of Ten," was established by the National Educational Association to chart its course. President Charles W. Eliot of Harvard was its chairman, and it drew into its deliberations some of the most powerful men in American scholarship. The balance of studies recommended in their Report remains that of conservative secondary schools today.

Mr. Sizer, Dean of the Faculty of Education at Harvard, describes the chaos that was secondary education in the 1890s and traces the national influence of the Report of the Committee of Ten in its attempt to provide order. $6.00
